elaborate portraits of our nation's founding fathers, former presidents and first ladies, she said.

"My favorites were Eleanor Roosevelt and Benjamin Franklin. I'll always remember those portraits."

The Drew family dined on danishes, coffee and orange juice while mingling with the crowd. Mrs. Clinton was kept well-guarded by a ring of secret service agents and a military detail, the Drew family said. Although they couldn't speak directly to Mrs. Clinton, there was plenty to see. The family was allowed to walk freely around the public areas of the White House and get close to some well-known politicians.

"The old senator from New York (Daniel Patrick Moynihan) was there," said Emily. "He had on a bow tie and suspenders."

Watching the motorcade leave the White House was interesting, too. "When they were leaving the White House there were about 10 limousines nine other cars and an ambulance following them," she said.

The Drew family didn't go to Washington empty-handed, either. They brought Mrs. Clinton a Jamestown Red Raiders state football championship sweat shirt and matching baseball hats for her, President Bill Clinton and daughter Chelsea.

Emily also provided a special gift of her own for the freshman senator from New York. "I gave her a Santa Claus pin that plays Rudolph the Red Nose Reindeer when you press the nose," she said.
