The band has been out of the public eye for about two years and Gustafson misses playing. The summer, he said, will be a good starting point for the new lineup to learn the old songs and go out and play them. "We'll see how that goes and see how we are received."

They won't be trying to reinvent themselves and Gustafson's main concern is he wants to make sure the band performs well and people enjoy themselves and like what they hear. If other opportunities arise that will only be a bonus.

"We are very relaxed about it. Should new songs start developing, it could turn out to be pretty good," he said.

I think the songs are really good from the past and I am excited to do all those (songs) and move forward and see where it goes from there," Ms. Saville said.

"She is quite a determined, ambitious young lady," Gustafson said "She plays guitar and has a wonderful voice. She's got a lot of charisma and we like that about her."

He said this may be a way for her to get noticed more in the music industry and the he doesn't foresee a problem with that. "I am sure she has ambitions beyond what we're doing here."
